

QUICK TAKE

by Christine
Chang

A snapshot of the issues surrounding campus today

Stoplight Day

Due to a shortage of participation, Stoplight Day, which gave students the chance to advertise their availability for Sadies through apparel color, was a confusing jumble of traffic signals. Those oblivious to the event unintentionally wore stoplight colors completely irrelevant to their status. Though a creative proposal on the part of the ASB officers, the partial flop was one reminiscent of failed mating calls. Let's hope for more success next year when the event won't be something new.

Freedom at last

While last year's seniors bemoaned the lockdown that kept them occupied in the gym during the Course Selection Fair, seniors this year got lucky. Permission slips turned in the day before allowed the soon-to-be graduates to leave, while juniors and underclassmen explored courses and prepared themselves for the coming year of classes. Staff members guarded campus entrances to check for wristbands on exiting students. Administration made the right decision in allowing students to leave.

Doodle for Google

The era of "starving artists" may just about be over. Google, arguably one of the world's most powerful companies, is scouting for the innovative doodles of students to beautify their trademark logo.

Submissions by MVHS students, which were selected by art teachers to be sent off on Mar. 5, were designed to the theme "If I Could Do Anything, I Would..." There couldn't have been a better time to promote such auspicious compositions, when the thought of three more months until graduation has many students weary and apathetic.

